Secure POS Vendor Alliance is launched by Hypercom, Ingenico and VeriFone

April 22, 2009 - 10:48pm | author: Michele | News | Payment systems

Hypercom, Ingenico and VeriFone, three payment industry participants, announced today about the formation of the Secure POS Vendor Alliance, a non-profit business organization chartered with implementing common payment security standards among vendors of secure point-of-sale (POS) devices used by retailers, acquirers and cardholders alike. The SPVA was created for the purpose of increasing awareness of security issues, encouraging adoption of best practices and easing consistency among standards that govern disparate components and participants in the payment environment. The SPVA will encompass the companies that provide the key security elements among consumers, merchants and transaction acquirers and issuers. Members of the SPVA deliver a unique global experience with security standards, ensure best practice implementation and continue to evolve the security enhancements and interoperability required to reduce fraud and lower risk for all participants in card payment transactions. Membership is open to all payment industry stakeholders. VeriFone, Ingenico and Hypercom, as founding members of the SPVA, appointed their representatives to the positions of executive managers of the new alliance. A fundamental objective of the SPVA will be to bring together industry experts to participate in "Technical Working Groups" which will focus on critical security topics. Merchants, Acquirers and Processors choosing SPVA-approved solutions can then be assured of the highest level of security currently available.
